Friday Morning, March 9, 1477. W. P. WALTON. . . Patter

The Inquestrat. It is done. The last crowning act of infamy la consummated, and Returning Beard Haves le President of the United States. Last Saturday night, in a secret chamber of the Capitul, he took the oath of office, and on Monday again swallowed it, no doubt laboring under the impression, that if the work of redressing this monstrous iniquity. ident, a couple or no were requirite for for them and no mercy, till their political pasan illegal one. The erowil that assembled to witness the ceremonies was composed principally of office-holders and reekers, and negroes—the respectable element being conspienously alsent. The address is a very mediocre production. He commences by saying: "I shall not undertake to lay down irrevocable principles or measures of administration, but rather to speak of motives that should animate us." Then he patronizingly throws out a nice little plumb for the South, and as usual, feels great solicitation for the welfare of the colored man and brother. "Universal Suffrage," he declares, 'should rest upon universal education' and he thinks that a permanent provisinn should be made for free schools by the State Government, supplemented by a legitimate and firm National authority. Then the usurper has the brasen affrontery to speak of reform, and makes some very fair suggestions in regard to it, winding up by a recommendation for an amendment to the Constitution, allowing a President but one term, but wants that term extended to the length of nearly two. He favors an early resumption of specie payment, and believes it the only way to prosperous times. He is against the Senate, but they havn't decided to the policy of interference in foreign let him in yet.
